As we wrap up our week celebrating America's 250th anniversary, today's focus is on advocating.

Advocating means speaking up for ideas, causes, or people you believe in. Whether it's promoting kindness, supporting a community organization, or raising awareness about an important issue, advocacy is one of the many ways citizens can help bring about positive change.

Effective advocates listen respectfully, learn the facts, consider different perspectives, and communicate their ideas with honesty and respect. Meaningful change often begins with a single conversation or a willingness to get involved.

Throughout this week, we've talked about volunteering, voting, participating in local meetings, and understanding our Constitution. Together, these actions remind us that being an American is not just about the rights we enjoy—it is also about the responsibilities we share.

At this time, please stand for the Pledge of Allegiance.

Thank you for taking part in this week's celebration of America's 250th anniversary. Have a fantastic Friday!
